Profile of Speaker

Trained in English Language Education, Language Studies and Applied Linguistics; Dr Norkhairi does not consider himself as a research scholar, rather more of a practitioner and trainer who applies and propagates best practices in language teaching by drawing inspirations from diverse fields. He started teaching on a part-time basis while juggling with studies during his undergraduate years and has accumulated over 25 years of teaching experiences by rendering his services to teaching pre-schoolers, elementary school students, secondary school students, undergraduates and adult learners that comprise local students, international students and exchange staff. Apart from teaching Malaysian students from multi-racial backgrounds, he has taught students coming from more than 20 countries.

Over the years, Dr Norkhairi has conducted over 50 English language and communication training to colleagues, subordinates, students and corporate clients. He has also served at a number of educational institutions such as at secondary schools such as in remote areas of Malaysia bordering Indonesia in Borneo Island, and at his home state Kedah, bordering Southern Thailand, at Matriculation (Pre-University) colleges, at the Ministry of Education, Malaysia and presently at Universiti Kuala Lumpur Malaysia France Institute (UniKL MFI). Along the way he has been awarded excellent appraisals and service awards for his passion, initiatives and contributions. He also has the unique experiences of being entrusted to lead key departments such as Quality Assurance, International Partnership and presently Industrial Linkages for the technical engineering university that he is presently attached at, albeit being a person from the language and humanities field. Dr Norkhairi strongly believes in the power of local initiatives and expertise contextualized within realities of global challenges and underpins with sound theories and best practices.

Multi-dimensional Strategies in Teaching and Assessing Language for Specific and Interdisciplinary Purposes in the 21st Century Global Contexts

Language education nowadays has tremendously changed due to globalization, advancement in information and communication technology and evolving political and socio-economic dynamics in the world. Language education dynamically expands by taking in wisdoms from diverse interdisciplinary fields and the professional competence and expertise expected of language educators have also transformed over time. This could be reflected from the increasingly complex set of goals expected from language teaching such as shaping learners' minds, fostering global awareness and enabling them to embrace multi-cultural diversity. Today's multi-cultural world is an exciting backdrop to language learning and teaching as instructions can be tailored to be not only interpersonal but also interculturally transformative for learners to foster inter-cultural dialogues in meeting 21st century challenges and sustainable development goals (SDGs). Against this backdrop, I reflect on my evolving role as a language educator who must embrace multi-literacies, adopt integrative approaches to teaching and fulfil transformative functions towards learners while exploring into the various disciplinary strands that make-up language and its contextualisations. I often found that such circumstance calls for a multi-dimensional approach in planning language lessons, teaching and assessing learners' attainment of the learning outcomes. By referring to my own experiences and roles as educator within a multicultural and multi-disciplinary contexts, the need for a collaborative, integrated and global approach to teaching and assessing learners is timely and mandated by the increasingly dynamic interdisciplinary interactions of the global communities intensified by advancement of media and social-media platforms. In recent years international educational engagements and interactions have dramatically increased due to physical mobility of tertiary learners from diverse fields of study, rise in on-line learning courses across disciplines and surge in interest on popular culture, technical innovations and cultural appreciations. The manner in which 21st century language educators deliver language courses and assess learners must therefore incorporate these changes in learner aspirations, needs and new realities. Multi-dimensional strategies must be designed and put in place so that these essential aspects are well-accounted for. To illustrate these multi-dimensional factors and strategies, I draw upon the findings from a few of my published studies in inter-related language and education domains which were elicited from university lecturers' perspective as well as from the language learners' perspective and juxtapose them to best practices and other scholarly literature. Essentially, an interdisciplinary synergy of input, feedback, reflections and wisdom from various stakeholders form the essence of the multi-dimensional strategies which are unpinned by theories, and principals of Language for Specific Purposes (LSP)(Widdowson, 1978, Hutchison & Water, 1986), Needs Analysis (West, 1926, Council of Europe, 1970), Assessment for Learning (AfL) (Black & William, 1998), Zone of Proximal Development (ZPD) (Vygotsky 1978) and sociolinguistics of globalisations (Bloomeart, 2010) to name a few.
